

In the early stages of recovery employers were able to boost output by getting more from their existing workforce. Now increased output means adding to hours worked, or increasingly, creating new jobs.